A Lecture by

Sid Goodloe

Watershed

Rehabilitation and

Management in the

Southwest

Quoting Chinese emperor Yu Chin from 1600 B.C.: "To protect your rivers, protect your mountains." Goodloe demonstrates that ranching and holistic management of watersheds can be compatible. He discusses the qualifications of a good land steward, especially concerning water resources and watersheds. He deals with the relationship between water availability and vegetative change and shows how riparian areas cannot be successfully rehabilitated and maintained without first solving the problems of the watershed.

For 48 years, Sid Goodloe has been owner-operator of the Carrizo Valley Ranch, 16 miles North, Capitan, New Mexico. Goodloe's interests range far beyond his own ranch. To name just a few, he is Founder & President of the Southern Rockies Agricultural Land Trust; board member of the Quivira Coalition, a group of ranchers and environmentalists working together for a better environment; he is international livestock consultant in Australia, Kenya, Zimbabwe, Brazil, Madagascar, Iran, the Dominican Republic, as well as the Ute Reservation; a member of the Users Advisory Board to the U. S. Secretary of Agriculture; he is Founding Member of the New Mexico Riparian Council, Member of the National Commission on Wildfire, etc. Because of his contributions he has been the recipient of many awards, such as, the National Cattlemen's Association's Environmental Stewardship Award, Region 6, in 1995, the New Mexico Watershed Coalition's Watershed Steward Award, 1999, the Lifetime Achievement Award from the New Mexico Riparian Council in 2003. Sid has an M.S. in Range Science and a B.S. in Animal Science both from Texas A & M University.

The lecture is free and open to the public.
